Last Saturday, our class went on a trip to a science museum. We left school at 7:30 in the morning because the bus ride took almost two hours. When we arrived, the museum was already crowded with children from other schools. Our teacher, Mrs. Shelar, told us to stay in groups of five and not to wander off alone.

First, we visited the space room. I loved it because we could see a model of a rocket and touch a real piece of a meteorite. Then we watched a short film about how electricity is made. After lunch, we did some experiments. My group built a small electric circuit with a battery and a bulb, and ours was the first to light up! The guide said we were very clever.

Last month, our school ran a "plastic-free week". At first, many students thought it was a silly idea. "How can we stop using plastic for a whole week?" my friend Jowaki asked. But our principal explained that the aim was not to be perfect. The aim was to notice how much plastic we use every day.

On Monday, we counted the plastic items we threw away at school. By the end of the day, the bins in our corridor were already full of plastic bottles, wrappers and pens. Nobody had expected so much. After that, things began to change. Students brought steel bottles from home, and the canteen started to sell snacks in paper bags. Some teachers even asked us to bring cloth bags for our books.

By Friday, the amount of plastic waste had dropped by almost half. Although a few students said that it was inconvenient, most agreed that it was worth the effort. Jowaki now says she carries a cloth bag everywhere. "I didn't think one week could change my habits," she told me, "but it did."

Q39. What was the main aim of the plastic-free week?

(A) to stop all plastic use completely
(B) to make students notice how much plastic they use
(C) to sell more paper bags in the canteen
(D) to punish students who used plastic

Q40. How did most students' opinions change during the week?

(A) They thought it was a silly idea at first but later agreed it was worth the effort.
(B) They liked the idea at first but later thought it should not be done.
(C) They never changed their opinion.
(D) They thought it was impossible to do at first. Later, they called it silly.
